HISTORY OF THE PUG

The Pug is of Chinese origin and dates back to the pre-Christian era. They were prized possessions of the Emperors of China and lived in a most luxurious atmosphere and at times even guarded by soldiers. Records show that three types of short-nosed dogs were bred by the Chinese. They were the Lion Dog, the Pekingese and the Lo-size. The Lo-size or "Foo Dog" was the ancient Pug.

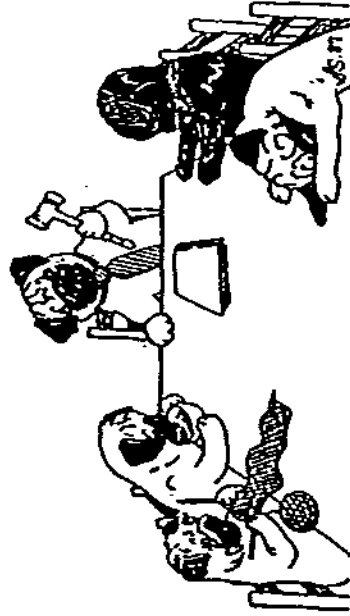

The Dutch traders brought the Pugs from the East to Holland and on to England. The more refined Pug that we know today must be credited to the English. This happy little dog was enjoyed by many monarchs of Europe and to this day is a favorite with royalty and discerning people all over the world.

The American Kennel Club first recognized the breed in 1885. The Pug's popularity grew by leaps and bounds but then dwindled around the turn of the century. A few dedicated breeders kept the breed going and slowly the Pug reappeared on the American scene. He is enjoying a rather steady rate of growth in popularity at the present time. He is not so popular as to be common nor so unknown to be rare.

All breeds of dogs are placed into seven groups by the A.K.C. The Pug's place is in the Toy Group. It is the largest breed in that group. It is not so much a Toy because of his size but rather because of his nature. You can see by his history that for many centuries he has been bred to be a companion and a pleasure to his owner.
